Grow plants: Grow vegetables from food scraps, or grow plants using hydroponics. You can also try growing a plant from a seed in a pot.

Make crafts: Press flowers to use in crafts and gifts. You can also make leaf and flower prints.

Make lip balm: Make your own lip balm using plants.

Make plantable paper: Make plantable paper from recycled paper.

Explore natural dyeing: Try natural dyeing with vegetables.

Filter groundwater: Use plants to filter groundwater.

Do a plant fermentation experiment: Try a plant fermentation experiment.

Create a plant maze: Create a plant maze using phototropism.

Aloe Vera: Besides its air purifying qualities, aloe vera is known to enhance mental focus and makes a great choice for enhancing productivity. Ginseng Ficus: Ginseng Ficus plant is said to be able to reduce stress and improve concentration, enhancing student's learning by helping them maintain focus.

Complex

In addition to social media influencers, more traditional communities of plant parents have appeared. Devotees can make actual human connections with like-minded people at a plant swap or a talk at a nursery. National conventions like the Tropical Plant International Expo have found a whole new and highly enthusiastic group of visitors with these young plant aficionados. I'll bet they have changed the experience of convention-going for traditional attendees. All these events are an excellent avenue for someone to get out and make friends, and they are less sticky alternatives to online dating or meet-ups. All of this may seem positive; but, just as with real parenting, there can be dark corners hidden from public scrutiny. Those with compulsive tendencies may find themselves over-buying and over-paying. Sometimes the act of acquiring is more fulfilling than the actual caring for the plant
